This book records the emergence of a lower middle class in late Victorian and Edwardian Britain. Victorian society had always contained a marginal middle class of shopkeepers and small businessmen, but in the closing decades of the 19th century a distinctive lower middle class emerged. The growth of new professions such as teaching, nursing, and social work provided opportunities for women to enter the workforce. The rise of industrial cities and the expansion of the railway system created new employment opportunities for men and women alike. The introduction of the factory act and the 10-hour day for women and children limited the working hours of the lower middle classes. The spread of educational reforms, such as the provision of free secondary education, helped to raise the aspirations of this group. The emergence of a lower middle class was a key factor in the transformation of Victorian society, as it provided a new social identity for a previously marginalized group.
