How salutary to feel guilty about enjoying paintings of the English landscape and peasantry. One aim of Dr Barrell's book is to animate out suspicions about the difference between the actuality of rural life in the later 18th century and the Romantic era and the image that we derive from various pictorial and literary sources. "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven": does this idea inform, however subliminally, Gainsborough's late fancy-paintings, the "Cottage Girl with Dog and Pitcher" and the rest?
