Historians have claimed that Scottish female religious houses and their inhabitants are not worthy of study. traditionally the reasons they have given are the paucity of the sources about convents and nuns, the smallness of the houses themselves, the lack of importance that convents had in the locale, and the claim that female houses are simply "too different" from male houses and therefore. prove problematic in any study of medieval monasticism. Because of these assumptions, little work has been done on any aspect of female religious houses and nothing at all on female heads of houses. indeed
