It is subordinate to constitutional law.Â Early English writers did not differentiate between administrative law and constitutional law and, therefore, the definition they attempted was too broad and general. Sir Ivor Jennings defines administrative law as the new relating to administration. It determines the organization, powers and the duties of administrative authorities.<sup>1</sup> This formulation does not differentiate between administrative law and constitutional law. It lays entire emphasis on the organization, power and duties to the exclusion of the manner of their exercise.
