All these literary and rhetorical features make medieval philosophical texts considerably more difficult to understand and interpret than modern or even classical philosophical texts. Moreover, the broad range of genres used in medieval philosophy raises questions about the nature of philosophical writing in general when compared to the much more restricted set of accepted forms in modern and contemporary philosophical works. 1. Historical Sources. 2. Literary Forms.Â This type of reading involved the consultation of authoritative sources on those texts.Â (See Kretzmann 1997, 301, where he argues that issues of style and rhetoric are not relevant to Aquinasâ€™ unadorned, straightforward, pellucid way of expounding, analyzing, and arguing [which is] ideal for philosophy.)
